

Replacement Certificates and Certified Statement of Exam Results

Many employers and Universities are insisting on seeing actual certificates for your qualifications. If you did not collect your certificates at the time of leaving, there is a chance that we may still have them or have a simple record of your results.

If you want an official record of your past results, you should contact the relevant exam boards. The school makes examination entries with four of the main exam boards in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. You can contact them directly for your O-level, CSE, GCSE and A level results. These exam boards also hold results for all the old exam boards. To find out which one to contact, look at the details below. Exam boards don't give replacement certificates. So if you've lost your certificate, you will instead get a certified statement of results or a letter confirming your results. The exam board will you charge for this service. Both of these are recognised by universities, colleges, professional bodies and employers. For all other qualification types, if you request a certificate, the awarding body may issue a replacement certificate, but this is at their discretion.
